ABSTRACT

This report provides a listing of 2861 hydrologic stations whose data were compiled into a data base that was used to prepare the U.S. Geological Survey 1990-91 National Water Summary on Stream Water Quality.

INTRODUCTION

Lanfear and Alexander (1990) described the construction of a data base of water-quality stations for the 1990-91 National Water Summary. The stations were selected primarily to determine trends in water quality, although some stations with a more limited data record also were used to determine water-quality conditions. The criteria for including stations in the data base are:

- Data must be transferrable electronically.
- Sampling site must be located by latitude and longitude, and have an assigned identification code and descriptive name. The agency collecting the data must be identified.
- Data must represent ambient surface water-quality conditions as opposed to effluent samples. That is, the sample must have been obtained from a stream and not from a discharge pipe.
- Water samples must have been collected using a method that is equivalent to standard USGS sampling methods, that is, depth-integrated samples composited to represent the cross-section of the stream. Water samples for dissolved constituents only may have been collected at a single point in the cross section of the stream if (1) it is known that the stream was well-mixed at the sampling point, (2) the method of sample collection is documented, and (3) any changes in the sampling methodology over time would not affect the comparability of the data.
- Water samples must have been analyzed using standardized methodology approved by USGS or the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency. The methods used must provide data that are comparable over time.

HYDROLOGIC DATA-COLLECTION STATIONS WHERE STREAM WATER QUALITY RECORDS MEET CRITERIA FOR THE 1990-91 NATIONAL WATER SUMMARY

The locations of 2861 hydrologic stations where stream water quality records meet the criteria established for the preparation of the U.S. Geological Survey 1990-91 National Water Summary on Stream Water Quality are shown in Figure 1. The stations are listed by state in table 1. The number of stations differs slightly from that reported in Lanfear and Alexander (1990) because of subsequent additions or deletions of stations requested by authors preparing the State summaries of the National Water Summary. For a variety of reasons, authors of the State summaries may not have chosen or been permitted to use all stations available in the data base.

Table 1. -- Hydrologic stations where stream water quality records meet the criteria established for the preparation of the USGS 1990-91 National Water Summary on Stream Water Quality.

1Some stations (e.g., those on an interstate river) were used for more than one state.

2USGS = National Water Information System files. STORET = U.S. Environmental Protection Agency files.

3T = Station had adequate data to perform a trend test for one or more constituents.
